

Katrina Altmannsberger

Dangers of Drunk Driving

Is driving drunk worth the risk of killing someone, killing yourself, or somebody being injured? There are a lot of risks that come with drunk driving. Three of the outcomes could be killing someone, killing yourself, and the possibility of injuries to others or yourself.

Killing someone affects their family, you, and your family. The person's family will have to bury their child, son, daughter, dad, mother and other family members. They will have a hard time getting over the death of a loved one. They will want justice for the loved one you killed. The effect on you could be guilt and prison time. You will have a hard time coping with the guilt of killing someone. You would also get prison time for killing someone while you're drunk. The effect on you family would be them thinking how could my child do this. Your family would be angry at you for doing something stupid. It might divide your family.

Killing yourself affects your family and friends. Your family would have to bury a loved one. They would have to get over losing a person they love. You wouldn't live the life you wanted to live. You would be six feet under the ground in a cemetery. If you had children, you would leave them behind. Your family would think why would you do this to yourself.

Injuring someone or yourself would affect their family and your own family. You could paralyze the other person or yourself. The person you might paralyze will probably dislike you for his or her life, but maybe not. The person and you will not live the same way that them or you have lived. Their and your dreams are going to change. The outlooks on life will be different.

Is drunk driving worth it? Drunk driving is not worth the risks. Living a life without drinking and driving is worth more because the other person and you can live a happy life.