

Teens Being Safer On the Road

Brittany Kelly

I think teens should be safer on the road because they can get into an accident and then die because of it. Like, if they were texting and they weren't watching the road they could go off the road and die. They could be putting make-up on and go off to the wrong side of the road. Also they could be distracted by people in the backseat. So, they could go and hit a car and maybe their car would catch on fire and burn.

My first reason that teens should be safer on the road is if they were texting someone. We have seen those "this is the last text my son/daughter saw before going off the road" commercials. People die because of texting. So the teens should turn off their phones or leave their phones at home. That is what I think is right.

My second reason that teens should be safer on the road is if they were busy putting make-up on they couldn't keep their hands on the wheel. They would be too busy by applying eyeshadow to watch the road. Their cars could flip over and they could get crushed. So, put your make-up on at home or don't wear it at all. That is what I would do.

My last reason that teens should be safer on the road is if the people in the backseat were listening to music really loud and the driver liked the song and started dancing. They would have their hands off the wheel. The car could go off to the other side of the road and cars could get hit. Innocent people could die because of people distracting the driver. So, the people in the back should not distract the driver if they don't want to die.

Those were my reasons for teens to be safer on the roads. Not texting anyone, not putting make-up on in the car, and for the people in the backseat not to be distracting. If everyone could do those things the number of car accidents and teens dying could drop so much. Hopefully in the future people realize that. That was my essay saying that teens should be safer on the road.
